

Leprechauns Hate Stereotypes

and all types of stereotypes

David J. Rouzzo

“Was Dr. Seuss really a doctor? If so, did he have patients? Did he keep his books in the waiting room for them to read?”

“How bored can people be that someone needed to invent crazy straws? I mean, do you seriously need something you drink from to entertain you?”

“Oxymoron: Freezer burnt.”

“Piggy banks are awkward, don’t you think?”

“I would have sold the golden ticket. If it’s really golden, then it had to have been worth a fortune! Charlie could have BOUGHT the chocolate factory and saved himself the trouble of hanging around with all of those rule-breaking children.”

“If you –don’t need no education- then why are you using a double negative? Perhaps they were secretly trying to say that they did, in fact, need an education. Hmm... Makes you think, doesn’t it?”

“Dinglehopper would have been a much cooler word for something you eat with. Think about it: Dinglehopper vs. Fork. It’s just more entertaining to say dinglehopper. What? We can have crazy straws but not cool names for our silverware?! Just look at the word spoon. It not only looks cool, but has a fun sound to it. {Spewn.} Now that’s nifty.”

“Why are they called Root Beer Floats? Technically, it’s the ice cream that floats, right? So, it should be called an Ice Cream Float.”

LIFE IS LIKE

*A long list of metaphorically spoken stuff,
from the year 2010.*

“Life is like breastfeeding. You start at a young age, and give it up shortly after, despite the many years ahead.”

“Life is like death by strangulation, only longer and more painful.”

“Life is like singing along with the opening worship at a new church. You spend the entire time extremely uncomfortable and just hope you can make up enough words to get through it.”

PEOPLE ARE LIKE

*A long list of
metaphorically spoken stuff,
from the year 2010.*

People are like corndogs.

On the outside they appear protected and secure and you think you know them, but on the inside, they're all a bunch of wieners.

*People are like fax machines. They have a send button, and you must dial a number,
and sometimes the paper jams, and you need a cover page, and...*

People are like dictionaries. They are thick and appear complex but once you look inside you begin to understand everything.

People are like video games. They have a system they go with and if the way that system is set up doesn't feel right to you, then you'll end up trading them in for store credit.

People are like traditional mild wings from Pizza Hut... they taste delicious.

People are like alcohol. They can be comforting if you have them in small amounts, but too much of them and next thing you know you're drunk and flipping the bird at everyone you see.

People are like laser pens. They are fun to play with, but if you hold them the wrong way somebody could go blind.
